Lake Buena Vista Village Townhouses

THE FIRST COMMUNITY IN WALT DISNEY WORLD

It's mid-October and I've just returned to California from Walt Disney World where I stayed in one of Lake Buena Vista's luxurious new Village Townhouses. It was an unforgettable experience.

Lake Buena Vista is a totally new concept in "second home" living. Quietly nestled in a colorful Florida setting, this new Walt Disney World community is located on a lush, green 4,000 acre site, less than 10 minutes away from the Magic Kingdom theme park. The abundance of land is evident in a sense of spaciousness, large recreation areas, and a rich natural landscape—virtually unmarred by roads and automobiles.

Automobile use will be sharply curtailed by keeping all through-traffic on the perimeter of the community. Inside the recreation and residential areas, all roads are private. It will be possible for residents to go to all the important places within Lake Buena Vista—clubhouse, shopping, recreation—without using an automobile, via a system of waterways, pathways, and trails. These pathways will be the "main street" of the community.

Most Townhouses have at least one side opening onto a major open space; a lake, a waterway, or the woods. These are not houses "along a street" with paths to the park; they are houses within and a part of the park. The idea is to make the house a part of the natural environment, with the possibility of seclusion, while it is part of an active, vital community—in other words, to offer a sense of community and a sense of privacy. Pervading theme is the dominance of the natural landscape and living with nature.

Inspired by the sunny and ever-bright Florida environment, Academy Award winning designer, Emile Kuri, has decorated the Townhouse interiors with a wave of contemporary colors . . . highlighted with elegant and artistic accessories. Perhaps best known for his work in motion pictures (he's won two "Oscars"), my friend Emile has created many of the fantastic interior settings for Disneyland and Walt Disney World. To his design talents, Emile's staff has added Disney know-how and flair. The result is a choice of exciting interiors . . . perfectly suited for the Village Townhouses . . . and suited perfectly to your comfort and enjoyment.

Unique to business and family communities, Lake Buena Vista offers exclusive Residential Hostess Service to Townhouse residents and guests. Whether you are meeting with business associates or vacationing with the family, our hostess will assist you with any request: information on church services, shopping, travel, air departure times, scheduled sports and cultural events, registered nurses, road maps or stock brokerage houses.

Just say the word, and it will all be awaiting your arrival . . . a car for your personal use . . . Magic Kingdom theme park ticket books . . . guided tours through the Magic Kingdom . . . starting times on our Magnolia, Palm, or Buena Vista Club golf courses . . . even flowers or gifts personally delivered to your Townhouse with your suggested card or message. Dinner reservations are yours for the asking . . . at the Polynesian Village, the Contemporary Resort or the new Walt Disney World Golf Resort Hotel . . . or perhaps you prefer an evening meal or cocktail party specially catered in your Townhouse.

Our hostess will also set up your business meetings. She'll even arrange for a conference room in one of Walt Disney World's hotels, space permitting . . . she'll assist in catering breakfast, mid-morning coffee, lunch, dinner or cocktails . . . make arrangements for chauffeured limousines or rental cars, audio-visual equipment, secretary for dictation, notary public or photographer! Hostess service is provided seven days a week. Costs incurred in the execution of a request can be billed to your Townhouse account.

For golfers, the private Buena Vista Club will embrace many of the social and recreational activities of the community. Already available for play is an outstanding 18-hole golf course. Coming is a multi-purpose clubhouse, clubhouse pool, and tennis courts. The club's golf course was designed by Joe Lee, who has created some of Florida's finest courses . . . including the spectacular Magnolia and Palm championship layouts in adjoining Walt Disney World. The Buena Vista Club offers social and golf memberships. Initiation fee and social membership are included in your Townhouse lease.

Maybe it's the freeways, or the smog, or the mad pace "out west" . . . I'm not sure . . . but I was truly impressed with Lake Buena Vista. Good air, sunny skies, warm nights, and a leisurely life-style. Great place for a second home!

DISNEY'S DARLINGS

Through the years, Cinderella, Snow White, Alice, and other lifelike beauties have received their well-deserved glory.

But the plight of the animal heroine is quite a different story.

And so to the felines, canines, bovines, rodents, and birds,

We'd like to dedicate the following words:

Some of you are camp. And some of you are vamps. But whether you are feathered or furry, each and every one of you is every inch a heroine—a heroine who always did her best to make the cartoon a total success.

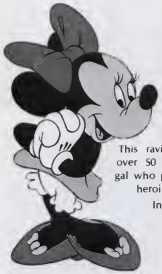

For ever since Minnie Mouse helped Mickey debut in the 1928 talkie, "Steamboat Willie," you Disney women have been working for decades to help men "thicken the plot" by being saved from fires, gorillas, bandits, floods, and a bevy of other calamities.

And in return for these men's heroic deeds, you've put up with their numerous antics and soothed their terrible tempers. You've also sung, danced, and played the piano for them, added a touch of romance to their lives, and performed many rescues of your own.

So, it seems only fitting to have a tribute to you gallant gals by taking a trek from the land of cartoon nostalgia to the animated features of the present.

And then, perhaps, all will see that you animal heroines have one common trait. For whether you were a mother, a sweetheart, or a friend—you were always valiant to the very end.

The Unsung Animated Animal Heroines

MINNIE MOUSE . . . 1928

This ravishing rodent has appeared in over 50 cartoon shorts. And she's the gal who paved the way for other animal heroines.

In her earlier pictures, Minnie had a rather wild time—being plagued by villains and disasters of every proportion. But by the early 30's, she proved to be a most versatile actress.

She saved Mickey at least twice by pouring hot coals down Peg-leg Pete's pants. And in 1933, Minnie portrayed a most convincing princess in "Ye Olden Days," not to mention her charming performance in 1941 as an old-fashioned belle in the "Nifty Nineties."

So, no matter the role, the time, or the scene, Minnie was always a true movie queen.

CLARABELLE COW . . . 1929

The second Disney animal heroine, Clarabelle made her debut in the 1929 cartoon short, "The Plow Boy."

And if it hadn't been for this barnyard beauty's piano- and fiddle-playing talents, most of Mickey's numerous revues and benefits would have been a total flop.

FIFI . . . 1933

This canine cutie first set Pluto's heart afire in 1933's "Puppy Love." And their relationship promised to be a lasting one.

But when Fifi returned to the silver screen in 1937 for "Pluto's Quin-Puppies," she gave Pluto the simple task of babysitting the pups for a few hours, only to return home and find everything topsy-turvy. So Fifi learned early in life that you just can't trust a male.

CLARA CLUCK . . . 1934

A chicken with a voice, this talented lady sang her heart out in her 1934 debut, "Orphan's Benefit." And she was quite a smash.

But in 1937's "Mickey's Amateurs," her singing reputation was almost ruined by Mickey's inability to organize a good show, and she had to suffer a great deal of heckling from a rowdy audience.

DAISY DUCK . . . 1937

Always dedicated to the best interests of Donald in cartoon after cartoon, Daisy tried to curb his terrible temper. And she usually kept her cool despite his many antics.

But in the 1947 cartoon "Sleepy Time Donald," when Donald sleepwalked all the way to Daisy's house, this patient lady walked him all the way home and tucked him into bed, only to have him wake up and accuse her of sleepwalking.

So unable to hold back any longer, Daisy gave her beau a big whack. And who could blame her?

CLEO . . . 1940

Actually, this charming female fish was in a few cartoon shorts, but she is best known for being the only female animal in "Pinocchio," and thus the first heroine to star in a full-length animated feature.

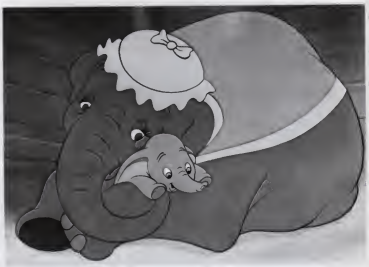

Terribly stable, unlike the flighty Pinocchio, Cleo kept Gepetto company whether he was in his workshop, or in the belly of a whale.

HYACINTH HIPPO . . . 1940

Some may not consider this "Fantasia" female a heroine. But any four-ton lady that can gracefully tiptoe through the ballet, "Dance of the Hours," deserves a lot of credit. So, hats off to Hyacinth!

MRS. JUMBO . . . 1941

After going into a rage when others teased her son about his oversized ears, Mrs. Jumbo became the first Disney heroine to be jailed.

But the worst indignity of all was being termed a "mad elephant" for merely expressing an opinion.

DINAH . . . 1942

Fickle Pluto's "other" flame, Dinah, made her debut in 1942's "Sleepwalker."

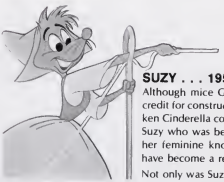

But Dinah's most heroic performance was in the 1946 cartoon, "In Dutch," where she saved a Dutch town from flooding by using her petite paw to plug a leak in the dike while Pluto merely ran for help.

SONIA and SASHA . . . 1946

These feathered heroines from "Peter and the Wolf" helped the young lad, Peter, to capture a dangerous wolf.

And since they outwitted a wolf and the grown hunters pursuing him, the spindly-legged bird, Sonia, and the big-beaked duck, Sasha, proved that it takes brains rather than brawn to be a success.

SUZY . . . 1950

Although mice Gus and Jaq usually received the credit for constructing a dress so that the heartbroken Cinderella could attend the Palace Ball, it was Suzy who was behind all the action. For without her feminine know-how, the dress would never have become a reality.

Not only was Suzy a talented seamstress, she also was a valuable friend.

LULUBELLE . . . 1947

The female heroine of "Bongo" from "Fun and Fancy Free," Lulubelle had to initiate the romance between Bongo and herself by giving him the slap that means "I love you" in circus-bear lingo. And, although it took him a while to get the message, Bongo finally figured it out.

NANA . . . 1953

The hard-working nursemaid for the three Darling children from "Peter Pan"—John, Wendy, and Michael—Nana was not even able to enjoy a brief midnight vacation to "Never-Never-Land."

Michael did try to help her fly, however, by throwing magic dust on her coat, but the poor pooch could only fly as far as her chain allowed.

LADY . . . 1955

A true heroine from "Lady and the Tramp," Lady endured such ghastly ordeals as cats, pounds, and muzzles. And she always justified her name, no matter what the crisis.

But perhaps the most noble aspect of Lady's character was her ability to see the best in all animals—whether they were ladies or tramps.

PEG . . . 1955

A real vamp, this "Lady and the Tramp" co-star, despite the fact that she was constantly hurled in and out of dog pounds, could still belt out a great tune.

PERDITA . . . 1961

As if being the mother of 15 pups wasn't enough work in "One Hundred and One Dalmatians," Perdita had to turn detective when her children were stolen by the evil Cruella de Vil.

And in the end, when all her offspring were found, the thanks Perdita received was 86 more pups to feed.

DUCHESS . . . 1970

This feline heroine from the "Aristocats," used to living in the lap of luxury, had to learn to "rough it" when she and her three kittens were kidnapped by the scheming butler, Edgar.

Like Lady, Duchess always upheld her name. And she, too, saw the best in everyone whether they were wealthy, bourgeois, or alley-bred.

MAID MARIAN . . . 1973

This latest animal heroine from "Robin Hood" is quite a "foxy" vixen. And Maid Marian upholds the Disney female tradition of valor by proving that neither time nor money can alter the course of true love. For she leaves the castle to live in the wood, just to be near Robin Hood.

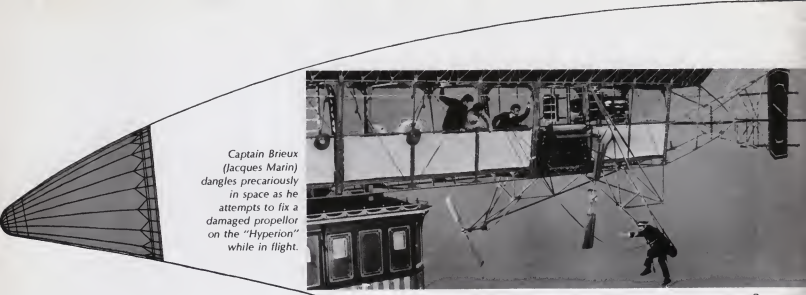

THE HYPERION

A CHARIOT OF MYTHIC PROPORTIONS

On the Set of Walt Disney Productions' "The Island at the Top of the World"

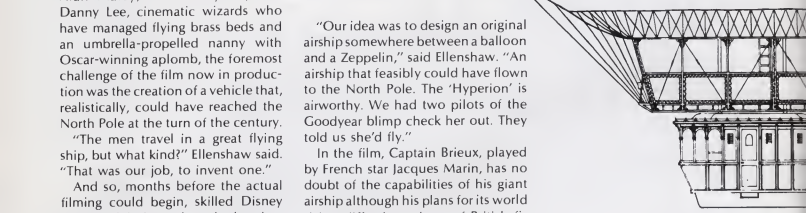

Hyperion, according to Greek mythology, was one of twelve titans who ruled the heavens long before the gods scaled Mount Olympus. Supernaturally strong, gigantic in size, Hyperion appeared to mortal eyes as the sun flashing across the skies in a chariot of dazzling brightness.

In "The Island at the Top of the World," Walt Disney Productions' epic adventure about four polar explorers who discover a lost land inhabited by a colony of Vikings in 1908, Hyperion emerges once again as a name to be reckoned with—albeit in ways that would have stupified the ancient Greeks.

Captain Brieux (Jacques Marin) dangles precariously in space as he attempts to fix a damaged propellor on the "Hyperion" while in flight.

David Hartman, holding the poodle, Josephine, Jacques Marin, at the wheel, and Donald Sinden react in different ways as the "Hyperion" makes her maiden voyage to the Arctic Circle.

For production designer Peter Ellenshaw and special effects directors Alan Maley, Eustace Lycett, and Danny Lee, cinematic wizards who have managed flying brass beds and an umbrella-propelled nanny with Oscar-winning aplomb, the foremost challenge of the film now in production was the creation of a vehicle that, realistically, could have reached the North Pole at the turn of the century.

"The men travel in a great flying ship, but what kind?" Ellenshaw said. "That was our job, to invent one."

And so, months before the actual filming could begin, skilled Disney artists and designers launched project "Hyperion." But where to begin? Aeronauts in 1908 had no airship capable of reaching the North Pole. It would have to be powerful yet maneuverable, buoyant though loaded with four men and supplies, and, most important, of a design consistent with then-existing energy and material resources.

Hundreds of drawings were made, researchers mined aeronautical archives for technical details of early airships, and engineering experts tested and retested theories and designs. Finally, after months of painstaking labor, production designer Ellenshaw and his staff introduced the truly formidable "Hyperion," a 220-foot, motor-driven tapered dirigible titan. Suspended from its rose-colored balloon were a canvas-covered catwalk containing machinery and supplies and a gondola replete with pilot's room and passenger quarters.

"Our idea was to design an original airship somewhere between a balloon and a Zeppelin," said Ellenshaw. "An airship that feasibly could have flown to the North Pole. The 'Hyperion' is airworthy. We had two pilots of the Goodyear blimp check her out. They told us she'd fly."

In the film, Captain Brieux, played by French star Jacques Marin, has no doubt of the capabilities of his giant airship although his plans for its world debut differ from those of British financier Sir Anthony Ross, played by Donald Sinden.

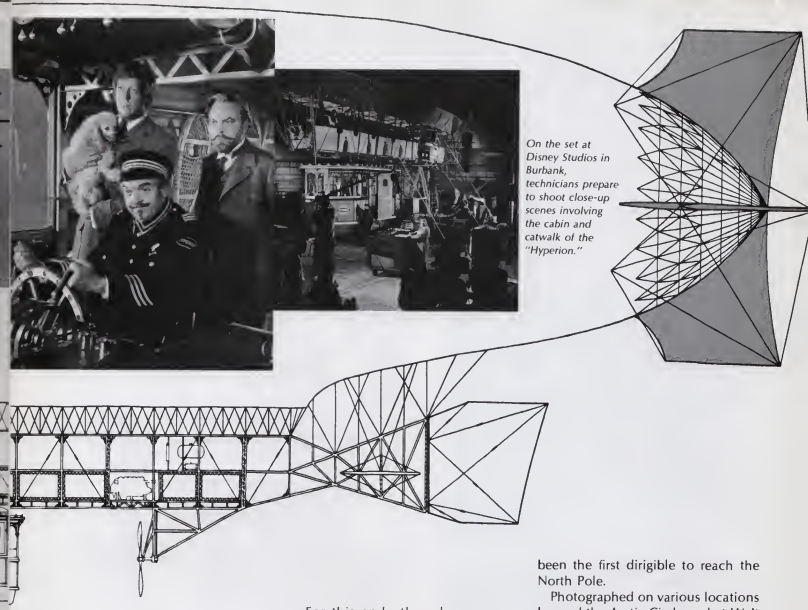

Sir Anthony, accompanied by American archaeologist, John Ivarsson (David Hartman), and Eskimo guide, Oomiak (Mako), compels the designer of the "Hyperion," which he has financed, to pilot the group on a dangerous mission into the arctic wilderness in search of his lost son. They find more than they bargained for when a storm carries them to a mysterious, time-forgotten island at the top of the world occupied by a colony of Vikings.

Although the "Hyperion" doesn't receive the world-wide acclaim envisaged by its designer, Captain Brieux, it more than proves its worth and credibility during the course of the film. Buffeted by ferocious winds, threatened by dangerous snow-covered mountain peaks, smashed by jagged rocks, and pierced by flaming arrows, still it saves the day by collapsing on the Godi, the Viking villain of the piece.

"We built three separate miniatures of the 'Hyperion' for the external action shots," explained special effects director Danny Lee. "For the long shots, we used a 1/25-inch-scale ship, and for closer shots, we used 1/2-inch-scale miniatures."

On the set at the Disney Studios in Burbank (an enormous sound stage resembling an airplane hangar), two 8-foot-long miniatures of the "Hyperion" rested side by side, temporarily inactive. Complete with catwalks, gondolas, and tiny propellors driven by gasoline engines, the two were identical except that one had a permanently crushed balloon.

Pointing to the partially dilapidated dirigible, Lee explained: "This one is used for the shots after the 'Hyperion' has smashed into the side of the mountain. For the sake of visual continuity, each shot in the film where the damaged 'Hyperion' appears must be exact to the smallest detail."

Lee also indicated a towering snow-covered "mountain," which filled an entire corner of the enormous stage, as the set for the crash of the "Hyperion."

"It usually takes half a day to set up a shot in a difficult sequence," he said. "Everything must be just right—lighting, atmosphere, wiring. Then, when the cameras roll, three or four takes are usually sufficient."

One of the most difficult scenes in the film requires the intrepid Captain Brieux to climb outside the gondola and lower himself from the catwalk to repair a propellor while in flight.

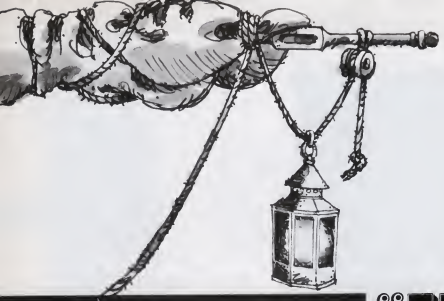

For this and other close-up sequences of the actors on the outside of the ship, a full-scale replica of the "Hyperion" gondola and catwalk were built and suspended by heavy cables from the ceiling of the set. To simulate the swaying movement of the airship, the cables rocked the "Hyperion" like a giant cradle.

A full-scale interior of the gondola, complete with steering wheel, propellor levers, gauges, and intricate instruments for navigation up front and passenger quarters aft, was built and mounted on hydraulic rockers. When the ship hits the storm, careening actors and flying equipment are effected by rockers tilting as much as 30 degrees to either port or starboard.

To the 40 Disney artisans who worked on the "Hyperion" from start to finish, she is a truly fantastic airship, a chariot of mythic proportions. And, they are certain, if she had existed back in 1908, she would have been the first dirigible to reach the North Pole.

Photographed on various locations beyond the Arctic Circle and at Walt Disney Studios in Burbank, "The Island at the Top of the World" is produced by Winston Hibler and directed by Robert Stevenson. Still in production, the film will be released during Christmas of 1974.

Steering into eternity, this skeletal captain warns: "Dead men tell no tales!"

"THE PIRATES OF THE CARIBBEAN" ARRIVE AT WALT DISNEY WORLD

Swaggering, singing, brawling, and bawling "it's a pirate's life for me!," the rowdiest crew of swashbucklers ever to cheat Davy Jones's locker finally have made a spectacle of themselves at Walt Disney World. And a $20-million spectacle at that!

"Pirates of the Caribbean," long one of the most popular attractions at Disneyland, opened its doors in Florida for the first time this December. Located in the brand-new Caribbean Plaza in Adventureland, the new show literally plunges adventurers into the 17th-century world of a Spanish seaport besieged by marauding buccaneers.

Setting the mood for the adventure to come, the Caribbean Plaza marketplace invites guests to wander in and out of tiny shops settled under the red-tile roofs reminiscent of Spanish architecture of years past.

Once through the portals of the new attraction, guests find themselves in the dungeons of "El Castillo"—an ancient Spanish fortress. As they wander past arsenals enroute to the landing dock where their flat-bottomed boats await them, the clank of steel and the occasional cry of a pirate echoes through the passageways.

Flickering lights on the walls of shadowy coves and an ancient ship riding at anchor on a moonlit bay greet all seafarers as they prepare to cast off from the dock. The gentle sound of the surf and the lilting cries of seabirds are punctuated by the raucous laughter of unseen pirate crews, undoubtedly burying their ill-gotten loot.

Once underway, guests immediately find themselves in a misty grotto where a ghostly voice warns: "Dead men tell no tales!" And so it seems to be, for everywhere the eye can see rest haunting skeletons in various stages of repose, some skewered through bony ribs with rusty knives of battles past, others collapsed alongside emptied treasure chests. A seagull, nesting on the cranium of his

for the saltiest adventure ever to shake your sails!

eyeless host, squawks angrily at the passing spectators.

As the boats pass into Hurricane Lagoon, howling winds, rain, and flashes of lightning startle even the most intrepid seafarers. And, as the eye adjusts to the spasmodically illuminated scene, a figure emerges at the wheel of a ship—steering no doubt into eternity, for his bones have lost all earthly thrust.

Suddenly, without warning, passengers plummet into a subterranean grotto and, as they disappear through a narrow cave-like passage, sinister voices warn them to "proceed at your own risk" for "ye may not survive to pass this way again!"

Once done cannot be undone, however. And for better or for worse, visitors who have ventured thus far soon will experience eye-to-eye confrontations with the rowdiest assembly of plundering blackguards since Blackbeard twirled his whiskers in ports of the Spanish Main.

Brought to life through the genius of "Audio-Animatronics" (an electronic system for animating three-dimensional figures), pirates of every description, Spanish grandees and winsome damsels, and a bevy of barnyard and domesticated beasts join together in an incredible recreation of the sack of a port-side town.

Guns thunder and pirates roar as a pirate galleon attacks a Spanish fort. With shells whistling around their heads and fizzles of steam escaping where hot shots hit the water near boats, guests drift through the initial battle for the taking of the town.

"Strike yer colors, ya bloomin' cockroaches!" yells the pirate captain from the afterdeck of his ship.

"Aye! Take that you greengo peegs, you!" answers the Spanish defender of the fort.

The battle still rages as guests pass onto the next scene, where the magistrate of the town is being dunked unceremoniously in a well by pirates who want him to tell where the treasure is hidden.

"Do not tell heem, Carlos!" screams his wife from an upstairs window, hastily closing the shutters as pirates let go a shot in her direction.

Other pirates guard bound townsmen, still in their nightclothes, and one boisterous buccaneer pipes away at his flute, keeping time as the mayor bobs up and down in the well.

In other parts of the city, the pirates are engaged in commerce of a dubious sort and other sport involving the fairer denizens of the city. One scene depicts a gaily bedecked rogue, blithely auctioning off the none-too-reluctant maidens of the town. In the foreground, a gorgeous redhead advertises her own charms, much to the chagrin of her less-endowed sisters.

"Strike yer colors ya brazen wench, no need to expose yer superstructure!" orders the salty pirate auctioneer, anxious to unload his less-attractive cargo.

"We wants the redhead! Pipe the redhead aboard!" yell his revelous mates, while goats, chickens, a donkey, and other animals add their comments to the occasion.

Laughing, singing, and shooting their guns into the air in sheer exuberance, the roistering pirates chase squealing maidens, harmonize with squealing pigs, toss wine casks at each other, and try to tempt hissing cats to join in the fun.

As the boats pass the scene of the burning city, the pirates join with a braying donkey and a howling dog to render their rollicking chantey at the top of their lungs.

"Yo ho, yo ho, a pirate's life for me!" they bellow, as flames crackle and piles of booty litter the street.

The hapless town magistrate is dunked by pirates for refusing to tell where the gold is hidden.

A bone for a key seems a fair exchange to these pirate jailbirds, but the friendly pup isn't so sure.

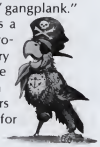

But not all the pirates are so fortunate. As the strain of the pirate's theme song fades with the view of the burning city, guests find themselves in the dungeon area. Here, while charred beams overhead threaten to collapse, a group of jailed brigands attempt to get the keys from a friendly dog, who wags his tail and stands his ground, key ring held firmly in his mouth.

Swiftly, the boats pass through the town's arsenal and into the brightest scene of all. For here, where two Spanish guards sit firmly trussed together, is the enormous treasure of the town. Triumphant pirates sit midst towering heaps of glittering jewels, coins, and ropes of milky pearls.

Gleeful and inebriated with success, the plundering pirates scatter the treasure about and fire their weapons into the air. Ricocheting bullets zing off walls, falling dangerously near the passing boats, as a drunken parrot perched on a trunk sings his own version of the pirate song: "Yo ho, yo ho, a parrot's life for me . . . so, drink up me 'earties, yo ho!"

The pirate's expedition has ended in triumph, and as guests depart the final scene, a peg-legged, one-eyed pirate parrot with a tattoo on his close-clipped chest, warns disembarking adventurers to "keep a lookout for the movin' gangplank! Steady as she goes, lubbers! Ye'll be needin' yer sea legs on that rollin' gangplank."

Scheduled to open as a climax of Walt Disney Productions' 50th Anniversary Year, the "Pirates of the Caribbean" will remain the high point for visitors to Walt Disney World for years to come.

A pirate huckster auctions off the city's none-too-reluctant maidens in the town square.

Dead men tell no tales!

The Midnight Merchants of Holiday Magic

A Twist of Gingham, A Sprig of Holly, and Bells that Sing in the Night

The merriest season of the year is here. And, just as hearts seem somehow lighter, the beauty of the world seems heightened, brighter. Strangers smile at one another, music fills the air, and everywhere the eye alights upon garlands of greenery, sparkling trees, and windows spangled with the season's happy greetings.

At Disneyland and at Walt Disney World, where guests daily enjoy the shops, restaurants, and attractions, and where nary a designer or decorator is ever in sight, the splendor of the holiday transformation, especially on Main Street in the Theme Parks, seems to occur overnight.

And, in fact, it does. For even though window set designs, decorative materials, and landscape elements are planned and purchased many months in advance of the Christmas season, the actual "dressing" of the Parks for the holiday month of December must be done in the space of two weeks and only at night, long after the Parks' last visitors have departed.

"Actually," said one Walt Disney World decorator, "we begin thinking about the basic materials we'll need for our Christmas decorations in January—it's an ongoing, year-long process. For example, there are 48 shop windows on Main Street that must be decorated in turn-of-the-century Christmas fashion. It's not easy to find old-fashioned decorations today. We go to swap meets, antique sales, and search foreign catalogues for glass ornaments and silk ribbons.

"In Victorian America, many of the decorations were homemade. And so, we use gingham-bow wreathes, calico ornaments for indoor trees, and 'natural' things like cookie molds, little straw baskets, and garlands of fruit, candy, and popcorn."

At Disneyland, decorators have incorporated many of the Disney characters into the themed window displays for Christmas. In the Market House window on Main Street, for example, "Happy" and "Grumpy" are seen decorating a tree made of dill pickles and tart, red apples, while in another window shaped like a large piece of bread, "Sleepy" holds a giant knife and is surrounded by jars of jam and jelly. The label reads: "Spread a lot of joy with Sleepy's preserves."

After Disney artists have sketched the design for each window and after buyers have assembled all the materials, Disney artisans begin "fabricating" the thousands of bows, wreathes, and garlands in backstage workshops. Toward the end of November, the nighttime decorating activities begin.

Working from 8 in the evening until 6 in the morning, the dedicated decorators transform shop interiors and display windows, string several miles of garland high above Main Street, cover dozens of lamp posts with holly wreathes and bells, plant thousands of red, pink, and yellow pointsettias, and prepare Town Square for the arrival of the season's decorating highlight—a 60-foot-tall, White Fir Christmas tree.

Old-fashioned lamp posts on Main Street are decorated individually with sprigs of holly, bells, and ribboned wreathes.

Main Street is reflected in one of the giant ornaments on the Christmas tree in Town Square.

This Christmas window could well represent a scene from Santa's workshop, with elves busily preparing toys for Christmas stockings.

"We go to the forests of Northern California in September and choose two of the tallest, most perfect trees we can find—one for Walt Disney World and one for Disneyland," said a Disney decorator. "By November, both trees are delivered to the Parks, and we begin the plugging, flocking, and decorating process. Each tree uses approximately 300 pounds of artificial snow, is covered with almost 3,000 ornaments of various shapes, sizes, and colors, and is strung with 2,750 lights on more than ¾-mile of cord."

By the first week in December, both Disneyland and Walt Disney World are picture-perfect fantasies of Christmastime splendor. And for the midnight merchants of holiday magic, whose hours of hard work make the illusion of instant Christmas beauty a reality, the pleasure on visitors' faces is ample reward for a job well done.

Disney decorators work long hours "backstage" fabricating Christmas decorations.

THE CHRISTMAS CANDLE

All bayberry and warmth,
I toast the frosted pane,
And as bundled people pass my way,
They hearken to my flame.
For 'tis Christmastide,
And deep inside,
All long to feel my glow,
So I warm the spirits of young and old,
Cheering them as they go.

Visions I give of treasures dear
To children with my light,
While older hearts find peace and calm
In thoughts of that Silent Night.
And so my flame burns steadily,
Sparkling through the snow,
Inspiring souls to wonder,
From whence I come and go.

My flame is born when those who love,
Despite life's pain and fear,
Reach out with understanding hearts,
To those both far and near.
And so, all passersby tonight,
As you fleetingly glance my way,
Release your cares into a sky,
Etched with the gold of day—

And know that the midnight shadows,
Will softly steal away.

"More than anything else," smiles Mona Baldwin of Disneyland's Tinker Bell Toy Shop, "I love dolls because they're just like little people. Their expressions are so real, that sometimes I expect them to talk to me.

"And I like dolls that are well-made because they hold their shape for a long time—and their features are unique. You know, it takes a lot of creativity to make a good doll. So our Toy Shop features only the best."

And Tinker Bell Toy Shop does feature only the finest quality dolls. For example, there's a collection of dolls made by the famed Madame Alexander which includes her intriguing "Portrait Dolls" that range from Renoir's "Cornelia" to Gainsborough's "Blue Boy."

Other Madame Alexander dolls found at the Toy Shop are patterned after classic characters like Jo from "Little Women" and Maria from "The Sound of Music." There's even a Scarlett O'Hara doll attired in the white-lace frock with kelly-green ribbons of velveteen that charmed the men at Tara so long ago.

"Madame Alexander's dolls are all hand-painted, and the variety of costumes, which are made of only the finest materials, are all hand-sewn because she is a perfectionist. Even her baby dolls are named and made with someone particular in mind," says Mona. "In fact, she made a Snow White, an Alice, a Cinderella, and a Tinker Bell doll exclusively for Disneyland.

"Since Madame Alexander's dolls are not made in large quantities, or for a long period of time, they become collector's items quite rapidly."

Other collector's items the Shop features are the "Nesbit" dolls from England. These dolls are all designed after famous historical personalities.

Nesbit features everyone from Madame Du Barry to Queen Elizabeth II. And all figures are authentically done to the tiniest detail.

"Henry VIII and all his wives are very popular," smiles Mona. "And some people return as often as once a week looking for these types of dolls."

Other popular dolls featured at the Toy Shop are the elaborate figures known as "Bed-and-Boudoir" dolls. Beauties dressed in gowns of all colors, they have silk faces that are hand-painted.

Then, there are the elegant "Fruga" dolls from Italy. These lovely imports have blazing blue eyes with long, thick lashes. Dressed in period costumes, with faces framed in dainty ringlets, the dolls radiate a most charming quality.

From Spain, Tinker Bell Toy Shop features the "Marin" dolls. Dressed in satin dresses bordered with lace, their long, black net veils frame delicately-featured faces. So all dolls in the Shop, whether they're from Italy, England, Spain, or America, are beautiful and unique in their own way.

"Dolls don't have to be expensive or elaborate to be loved," says Mona. "Take the popular Raggedy Anns and Andys, they're just simple American folk dolls, but they've delighted people for ages. They never grow old.

"And baby dolls are very popular. All our babies are soft and cuddly, and they have a certain realism about them because they're all different looking—just like real babies and toddlers.

"Sometimes a little girl will come into the Shop and become immediately attracted to a doll that her mother finds terribly unappealing. But I always let the child hold it so that, perhaps, the mother can see how much the child loves it.

"After all, everyone has her own preference when it comes to choosing a doll. For instance, sometimes a doll strikes me as being too 'Uppity' or bland, or it reminds me of someone I don't particularly care for. But I've always got to admit that all our dolls are precious treasures with personalities all their own."

And so it is. There is a doll for anyone at Disneyland. The unique little people of Tinker Bell Toy Shop wait to take a child—or anyone young at heart—to the land of make-believe. A land where joys, sorrows, and secrets are shared. And most importantly, a land where painted smiles last forever.

Tinker Bell Toy Shop's Mona Baldwin hugs one of her little people.

THE LAND OF THE LITTLE PEOPLE

Where Winston Churchill, Scarlett O'Hara, and Napoleon Bonaparte All Wait to Greet You.

Carrot-topped Raggedy Anns and Andys welcome all who enter their domain.

Madame Alexander's Scarlet O'Hara is dressed exactly like her counterpart in the 1939 motion-picture classic "Gone With The Wind".

"All our babies have a certain realism about them."

IN AND AROUND WALT DISNEY PRODUCTIONS

Movies

. . . How do you make a sound like a magnet? Or a shimmering spider web or a passionate moose in love with a caboose? Jim Macdonald, who has done the sound effects at Disney Studios for thousands of animate and inanimate objects during his 40-year career, is a master of the auditory illusion. For example, in "Robin Hood," Disney's new animated cartoon feature, Jim was faced with the challenge of reproducing the sounds of arrows hitting their targets, gold coins trickling through the fingers of greedy Prince John, the marching feet of a troop of soldiers, and the pounding hooves of galloping horses. He met the challenge head on and succeeded admirably. And how was it done? A Jew's (jaw) harp twanged into an especially sensitive microphone resulted in a "boi-yoi-yoi-yoinnnnggg"—an arrow hitting its mark. Empty brass bullet shells dropped on a table sounded like gold coins should sound but do not. Pegs attached to rawhide strips and tied in the frame of a soft-drink case created the effect of a troop of soldiers marching by. And horses' hooves were created by pounding halves of coconut shells against a flat surface. Said Jim: "I stopped asking a long time ago what things would sound like if they had a sound. Now I just start working on it."

. . . "Paniolo," Walt Disney Productions' rousing screen adventure about the first cowboys on what were then the Sandwich Islands, was filmed on location on Kauai, the most exotic of the Hawaiian Islands. Starring James Garner as a shanghaied Texan who turns a bunch of happy-go-lucky islanders into hard-riding cowhands, "Paniolo" is scheduled for release in the summer of 1974.

. . . "The Art of Walt Disney," a 458-page volume devoted to the creative world of Walt Disney and published by Harry N. Abrams, Inc., is currently on sale at bookstores throughout the country. Filled with 739 illustrations—351 in full color—the book traces the career of Walt Disney from the debut of Mickey Mouse in 1928 through his many animated cartoon shorts and features to the realization of Disneyland and Walt Disney World. Benefiting from free access to the Disney archives, "The Art of Walt Disney" includes hundreds of previously unpublished drawings, paintings, and photographs. The pre-publication price of $35 expires at the end of the year; thereafter, the 10⅜ x 13¼-size volume retails at $45.

Wonderful World of Disney

. . . Milestones are rare in any industry, but especially are they rare in the television industry, where series die by the dozen. Having begun its 20th year on TV this fall, "The Wonderful World of Disney" is currently television's longest-running prime-time show. Originally aired on ABC-TV (1954–1961) before moving to NBC, the Sunday-night anthology is only three years shy of catching TV's all-time champ, "The Ed Sullivan Show." Winner of seven Emmy Awards during its 20 years, "World of Disney" owes its longevity to the high quality of shows presented and to its anthology format, which endears the program to young and old alike. On the basis of fine performance, NBC-TV renewed the show through the 1975–76 season. Disney in turn granted an option to the network to extend the series through 1978.
